He still wishes to possess the dead Joan, however, and has his servants procure a series of women whom they dress up in armour and present to him as Joan. She never meets Scipio face to face, however, and goes nobly to her death by drinking the poison sent her by Masinissa, the Roman ally whom she has suborned. Since the woman warrior does not go to war against other women but against men, the people she is going to kill, defeat, humiliate, and maim are men.

We might remember that the date of Richard Strauss and Hugo von Hofmannsthal's

If they had used these imaginings, they would only have been able to use them to look at other women with what Sigrid Weigel twenty years ago called der schielende Blick the squinting gaze.
