If this is true, then philosophy should be silent and learn to practice oriental mysticism which is characterized as "idealess contemplation. The private world of instinctive interests is a small one, set in the midst of a great and powerful world which must, sooner or later, lay our private world in ruins.

Aristotle has a sentence that is widely quoted about this emphasis: Philosophy is in contrast generally to a movement like Christianity which has a built-in motivation for changing the world by the conversion of people to its cause. Watts describes philosophy from the standpoint of contemplation and meditation.

Emergent theorists believe that this conception of value has relevance to all. It cannot be maintained that philosophy has had any very great measure of success in its attempts to provide definite answers to its questions. The following divisions are important in an over-view of the subject of philosophy.
