What hast thou left thee now? CV Would but the Desert of the Fountain yield One glimpse--if dimly, yet indeed, reveal'd, Toward which the fainting Traveller might spring, As springs the trampled herbage of the field!

Ever too bright is that outward show, Dazzling the eye still they see not two. Turn then away from life's pageants, turn, If its deep story thy heart would learn! Then, sad and slow, And mantling up his stately head in wo, "Thou'rt passing hence," he sang, that warrior old, In sounds like those by plaintive waters roll'd. Now then night grows deep, And silent as its clouds, and full of sleep. My first, dem Brittischen Volke, wenn ihm das Deutsche nicht fremd ist! Which is accordingly exemplified in the concluding Reflection and Prayer.
